

GRANT, SHERMAN, SHERIDAN.

Richard Watson Glider in The Critic.

Quietly, like a child
That sinks in slumber m'd,
No pain or trouble thought his well-earned peace to mar,
Sank into endless rest our thunderbolt of war.

Though his the power to smite,
Quick is the lightning's light—
His single arm an army, and his name a host,
Not his the love of blood, the warrior's cruel boast.

But in the battle's flame
How glorious he can be!

Even like a white-combed wave that breaks and tears
the shore,

While wreath lies strown behind, and terror flies before.

"Twas he—he voice, his might—

Could stay the palm-flit,

Alone shame back the heading, many-leaved retreat,

And turn to evening triumphant morn's foul defeat.

He was our modern Mars.

Yet firm his faith that wars

England would cease to vex the sad and unconquered earth,

And pose forever reign, as at Christ's holy birth.

Best lands in whose dark hour

Both rise to mighty power

But patriot-soldiers, true and pure of heart:

Of such our chief of all:

And who he broke the wall

Of civil strife in twain, no more to build or mend;

And he who hath this day made Death his faithful friend.

And now above his tomb

From out the eternal gloom

"Welcome" his chieftain's voice sounds over the

cannon's knell;

And of the three one only stays to say "Farewell!"
